Why India Should Be Divided In Multiple Time Zones?

Time and tide wait for none, but the proper utilization of time depends how we deals with our work and activities. Once upon a time, we made the clock to keep ourselves in track but gradually we became addicted to it & now we run behinds it. However, being an animal our life restarts every morning with the first rays of sun. From morning to night, we used to move accordingly with the movement of sun and rhythm of clock. India is a vast country where there is only one time zone, here it is very tough to maintain and move with that. Nevertheless, multiple time zones can make it better. The things though look very complicated with multiple time zones, as we are not habituated to that but it is very much necessary to maintain the work culture in the offices and proper utilization of human resources. Before going for multiple time zones few things, we need to access and compare.

We all know that with the start of a new day our mighty sun starts its journey to Indian soil from eastern zone like Arunachal Pradesh or Manipur in the very early morning (approximately 4.30 am - 5.00 am) but being in the same country the birds of Gujarat waits for another one and half our for their first fly of the day. What does it mean? It is actually the main reason that northeast is still lacking in every sides of development. You may ask how?

It is psychologically proved that fresh minds can only give the best effort to learn and work. Therefore, the habit of move with clock and awake up with sun actually makes a big gap of 3 to 4 hours before we leave for our office or college, which simply indicates that when we work by staying at north-eastern states we don't able give the freshness of our potency in learning or work station. On the other hand, people those who are living in the same country, in Gujarat awake up lately as the sun reaches there lately but the used to give attendance to their school or office in the same official time with more freshness and potency. This simple comparison makes it clear that though we run behind a same time in the clock but we used to reach our offices with a different mind stratus. People of north-eastern region used to spoil the goodness of a fresh morning in their homes, where as people of Gujarat usages the same in their works. Such habit makes a huge different in work culture or learning habits. Almost a similar scenario can be seen in the evening. It is mentionable that on our cell phone there is an option 'Daylight Saving', how many of us are aware of it? It is actually followed by many people in the world to maintain a suitable working time according to the movement of sun and the change of seasons. During the short and long days of the year, it will maintain a stable working period by intentional change in the personal clock. It is a smart example how people of the world moves with sun and runs with clock.

Multiple times zones though itself will be a challenge for the illiterate peoples on travelling countrywide. It may somehow be a little headache for media sectors specially the national on air or satellite media. Someone, that is why, may opine to reschedule the office times as accord to the latitude in the different regions of India. But, unfortunately, this is probably not going to work permanently. Negativity has already been rooted so deeply in the minds of each Indian that we can not justify the real equality in term of conditions. Everyone run after the equality without reasoning the associative factors. They will ultimately sit on an agitation when the official times will be made different for different latitude. Therefore, dividing the country into more time zones will be a handy step towards the wellness of human health and effective utilization of human resource. Matching the local clock with geographical clock will be more beneficial and fruitful for the reestablishment of the biological clock in relation to the daytime. The whole population habituating in different latitude of India could then be nationally utilized physically, mentally and socially in a more efficient degree with this multiple times zone concept.
